Washington, D.C. - Today, The Enlisted Association of the National Guard of the United States (EANGUS) is honored to announce a new partnership with Norwich University. As the oldest private military college in the nation, Norwich has been the leader in evaluating military training to determine programmatic credit.

Daniel Elkins, the Director of the Veterans Education Project—the wing of EANGUS that tackles issues that specifically impact Student Veterans—said, “our partnership with Norwich is critical because Norwich stands as a model for others to follow. Norwich programs are academically rigorous, relevant to the real world, and the experience benefits Veterans.”

“Norwich University has been educating citizen soldiers for 200 years and we’re proud to continue that legacy with our new partnership with EANGUS,” said Norwich University President Richard W. Schneider.

The Norwich model, beginning with the bachelor’s degree completion program in Strategic Studies and Defense Analysis, works closely with military training organizations to carefully evaluate training and military occupational specialties (MOS). This process maximizes the ability for transfer credit and reduces the total time and cost for Servicemembers to complete their degree programs by allowing students to receive college credit for course requirements when prior military service training meets degree requirements.
